According to her svidence under cross-examination, the solicitor employed by Clovis Bonaparte confirmed this assurance last September, and wrote out a. confession in which the unhappy woman was made not only to repeat the communicution concerning De Coghill which she had On Bombayvoluntarily imparted to Clovis at the commencement of the year, but to accuse herself of 'horrid practices' extending over a long period of time. She swore that these accusations had been inserted in the document without her knowledge, and detcribed the person who had drawn them up as one 'who had played every trick of infamy that could be played upon a woman. While protesting that she had not intended to state anything that was not true, she admitted that, on the night when she signed the 'confession,' she would have done anything, even to sacrificing her soul, in order 'to save that wretched man, her husband, who left her immediately after she had affixed her signature to a document which she had not road, and which had
